

Workforce and Economic Development—Working Together

Workforce Development Councils

Washington has 12 regional councils that help ensure workers are trained to fill jobs in local areas and lay the groundwork for further business and job growth through grant programs, planning and on-the-ground connections between business, education providers, economic development and labor around industry-specific issues.

Associate Development Organizations/Economic Development Councils

These organizations, often called Economic Development Councils, help businesses by holding seminars and workshops, providing one-on-one counseling, hosting networking events and providing demographics and other valuable information.

Small Business Development Centers

Located throughout Washington, these centers promote economic vitality by providing advice, training and research to entrepreneurs and existing businesses statewide.

Workforce Training and Education Coordinating Board

The state's Workforce Board is a customer-focused advocate for Washington's workers and employers. The agency and its citizen board oversee 17 workforce programs, administered by seven agencies, and measure the performance of the state's 12 largest programs. The Workforce Board advocates for lifelong learning so all workers become better educated and better skilled—keeping our workforce, and our state, competitive.
